India Desk

Germany and India are well-positioned to benefit from closer economic and trade cooperation.

India, with its continuous growth rates, is one of the largest future markets in the world. The aspiring country has significant economic potential and offers German companies the vibrance, connectivity, resources and critical mass available to accelerate and support international growth.

Simultaneously, Indian companies are developing new markets through trade, alliances, expansion and business acquisitions. In parallel private individuals and family offices in India are progressively regarding foreign countries as attractive destinations for their portfolio investments. Germany's political and economic stability, technological leadership and high degree of public security makes it an exceptionally attractive investment destination to service these requirements.

Germany's position as India's largest business partner in the European Union outside the United Kingdom and the potential effects of Brexit on trade, immigration and cooperation in general are a good foundation for optimising the cooperation of the two countries in the near future. One of the main challenges of German-Indian economic cooperation has however been the cultural differences between the two countries. It is important to operate confidently in the legal and administrative systems and to develop sensitivity towards customary business practices.
